

What if My Child is Bullying?

Kidpower is an educational charitable organization that, since 1989, has brought "People Safety" education to over 1.2 million children, teenagers, and adults, including those with special needs, from many different cultures - close to home and around the world. For publications; free articles, podcasts and e-newsletter; and information about our services and locations, please visit www.kidpower.org.

Copyright © 2009 Irene van der Zande. All rights reserved. Permission is granted to print this PDF and copy this article for personal or free charitable use only as long as the Kidpower information and this copyright notice are clearly visible. For example, this means you can use this article as an educator in your classroom. However, prior written permission is required to reproduce this article in any other printed or digital form for any other purpose including on websites, in newsletters, or as part of a paid publication or service. Please contact safety@kidpower.org.

Note: The following information is from our Kidpower "People Safety" Solutions book, Bullying - What Adults Need to Safe. Our Bullying Prevention Resource Page and Website provide information on our on-line Library with free articles, cost publications for sale; in-person workshops; long-distance coaching; consulting; and curriculum development.

Bullying in schools, families, and other groups affects the physical and emotional safety of everyone in the group. Adults can help children stay safe by teaching children skills to deal with bullying. In addition, children using bullying behavior need support in learning different ways of interacting with other children.

One parent emailed us the following question; our answer follows.

Question: What if my child is the bully? Sometimes he calls other kids names and pushes them around to get what he wants.

Answer: Children who bully in this way need safer tools for getting what they want, better skills for handling the disappointment of not always getting what they want, clear boundaries about what the rules are for behavior, and consistently enforced consequences for breaking those rules.

Safer tools can mean learning to ask instead of grab and learning to look for ways in which everyone can get at least some of what they want.

Skills for handling disappointment can mean learning how to think first and calm down when you are upset, learning to wait your turn, and finding other things to do when you cannot do what you want right away.

Clear rules means being very specific – no putdowns, no name-calling, no pushing, no hitting. Bullying in schools and other groups often escalates quickly without clear rules and consistent adult follow-through on those rules.

It is important that kids see that everyone--especially the adults around them--are following the same rules. Consistent consequences need to be thought through ahead of time to make sure that they are reasonable and will be upheld by all the adults responsible for supervision.

The bottom line is that the child needs to be stopped from continuing the bullying behavior quickly, clearly and directly. If this doesn't work, there might be further consequences like sitting down for a few minutes instead of playing, having to do something inside away from other kids for a little while, or losing some privilege like watching television or playing on the computer.

Bullying in schools and other groups can improve when adults support all of the children – children using bullying behavior as well as those being bullied – in learning more effective skills for staying safe, for being powerful, and for getting what they want. Getting support for stopping bullying behavior sooner rather than later can make a big difference. Teachers, counselors, parenting classes, and friends can all be valuable resources.